

Megan Fulwiler is Associate Professor of English and the Coordinator of the First-Year Writing Program at The College of Saint Rose in Albany, NY, where she teaches courses in writing, rhetoric, and autobiography. Her research has focused on how new media composing processes expand and challenge composition pedagogies. Her work has appeared in Computers and Composition (2011), as well as the collection The Promise and Perils of Writing Program Administration (Parlor Press, 2008). Along with Jennifer Marlow, she is currently making a documentary film about the pedagogical and ethical implications of Higher Education's growing reliance on contingent labor.

Jennifer Marlow is Assistant Professor of English at The College of Saint Rose in Albany, NY where she teaches courses in composition and new media. Her work focuses on exposing the pedagogical constraints of traditional course management system software and seeking innovative digital alternatives that bring learning "outside the box." When she is not busy thinking about how to improve writing classroom practices, she makes documentaries with colleague, Megan Fulwiler, about how the labor conditions of higher education affect everything from academic freedom to student learning to how we implement and think about technology.
